A Mountain Spring

Henry Kendall

Peace hath an altar there. The sounding feet
 Of thunder and the wildering wings of rain
 Against fire-rifted summits flash and beat,
 And through grey upper gorges swoop and strain;
 But round that hallowed mountain-spring remain,
 Year after year, the days of tender heart,
 And gracious night whose lips with flowers are sweet,
 And filtered lights, and lutes of soft refrain.
 And still, bright pool. To men I may not tell
 The secrets that its heart of water knows,
 The story of a loved and lost repose;
 Yet this I say to cliff and close-leaved dell:
 A fitful spirit haunts you limpid well,
 Whose likeness is the faithless face of Rose.
